

Pragmatism, Its Sources And Prospects

The creation of the committee follows work by DH workforce director Gavin Lerner in autumn 2016, which scoped out the challenges facing the NHS through to 2025 and was an attempt to develop a national strategy.

Sources said this was initially abandoned because of reluctance by the DH to be viewed as responsible for NHS workforce, and to solve its problems, when it believed arm's length bodies shared this role and needed to be doing more. This directly led to the creation of Mr Dunne's committee.

One source close to the work said: "The department recognised that more needed to be done on the workforce challenge facing the health service. Last year the view was that a single document would have limited value and instead the DH needed to deliver alignment between the ALBs.

"The ministerial committee has been taking forward the workforce strategy since then."

Another source said: "Now finally there is some pragmatism and realism but a bit late in my honest opinion. Still we now have a chance to redress the issues with this strategy but the question is what we want and what we can afford."

There will now be work to produce a single document, several sources told HSJ. HSJ understands HEE will lead work on the new strategy with the intention that it could be completed as early as December.
